Dear Holy Rosary Friends and Families,

Our lives are often very complex. How do we make them simpler?

Charity is the principle of the spiritual life that gives simplicity to our lives by directing our whole life to God as the one thing necessary. We can gain insight into the function of charity by considering a very mundane example: my youthful attempt at snowboarding.

I once tried my hand at snowboarding while I was in the 8th grade. It was a school field trip and we received some basic instruction on how to snowboard before we hit the slope. I learned many things from this instruction, but I was not paying attention to the most important lesson—how to stop.

I am unique in that I reached full stature when I was 14. At that young age I was the same height and weight as I am today. So, when I hit the slope without knowing how to stop or carve down the slope, I went down the hill so fast that I felt like one of those rocket cars trying to break the sound barrier on a dried lakebed. I could only stop by deliberately falling and so I tumbled my way down the mountain. The hint that snowboarding wasn't for me was that the people on the chair lift above me started cheering for me!

Snowboarding requires knowing all the necessary skills—like stopping—but also how to coordinate all these skills together and have this coordination be so habitual that the skills are enacted spontaneously and without much forethought.

So too for the spiritual life. The skills we have are those good habits, the moral virtues, which are the skills we need in the different areas of our life—like in matters of fortitude and temperance—that enable us to flourish as human beings. However, we are not just to live a human life, but the higher life of a child of God. We are to live a divine life, because, as Saint Augustine says, God became man to make men gods. Thus, we also need moral virtues proportionate to this new life of grace. God infuses in us moral virtues called “infused moral virtues” which enables us to flourish as a child of God and not merely as a human being.

How are all these skills unified and directed to a single goal? The different snowboarding skills elicit certain actions—like stopping and carving down the mountain—that enable us to snowboard well. All these skills need to be commanded to serve a single end: that of snowboarding well and enjoying ourselves.

In the order of nature, prudence serves this role by specifying what manner of acting is beneficial to us as human beings. For example, temperance disposes us to moderation in matters pertaining to touch—like taste and sex. But by what measure are we to judge that we are eating the right amount and not overeating? How does our moderation with food serve our overall human flourishing? Prudence provides the measure and directs virtue to a goal. It plays a role like the role of charity in the order of grace.

When grace perfects nature and directs us to the higher supernatural goal of seeing God face to face as a child of God, we need a principle to determine the measure of our actions relative to this supernatural goal. For example, we must determine how much time to spend in prayer and how much time to focus on other matters done for the sake of God. We also need an organizing principle which commands all the virtues to serve this higher goal.

God provides an infused virtue of prudence that serves a role in the order of grace analogous to prudence in the order of nature. Nonetheless, the Christian life is characterized by a participation in God's love and not merely by prudence, so we need to look for a more fundamental principle.

The theological virtues of charity—called theological because it relates us directly to God—provides the ultimate measure for our actions and directs all the virtues (infused or not!) to the supernatural goal of seeing God face to face in heaven. Charity is called the “form of the virtues” because it gives an overall structure to our spiritual life by directing every virtue and virtuous action to God.

Let us ask God to increase our charity to provide greater simplicity to our lives.
